On March 23, 2012, the Alaska Rural Coalition filed a petition on behalf of its member companies seeking a limited waiver of the call signaling rules adopted by the Commission in the USF/ICC Transformation Order.¹ Specifically, the Alaska Rural Coalition requests a limited waiver for its member companies because "Alaska's network infrastructure makes compliance with the Commission's call signaling rules very difficult and prohibitively expensive."² The Alaska Rural Coalition maintains that its member companies rely on traditional MF signaling and that "[t]he technical limitations of MF signaling are incompatible with the Commission's new signaling rules and could create potentially substantial privacy issues."³

On March 28, 2012, FairPoint Communications, Inc. (FairPoint) also filed a petition seeking a limited waiver of the call signaling rules adopted by the Commission in the USF/ICC Transformation Order.⁴ FairPoint explains that because many of its subsidiaries are located "[i]n rural areas, with a wide
